Abstract

Aesthetic dental re-habilitation procedures are one of the most important and commonly done practices in today's clinical work. These can range from a single tooth replacement to a full arch reconstruction. The art and science of such replacement or restorations requires a correct knowledge of the RIGHT BALANCE between the teeth, muscle system and the Temporomandibular Joint assembly, all together, forming the Stomatognathic System. The correct liaison between the three components leads to comfortable, predictable and long-lasting function along with natural aesthetics. But if not placed at the right balance, the entire rehabilitation could fail leading to bigger problems. Understanding the magnitude of the problem and its overall impact on not just the dental but the entire musculo-skeletal system and its relation to the oral cavity would help the clinician to better understand this science and also prevent further and bigger damage to the dental components along with the cascading adverse effects that can affect the whole body balance and can cause other serious issues for the patients.
