Summary

Implant success depends on a multitude of factors, soft tissue management is critical to the aesthetic success of anterior implant tooth replacement in the partially edentulous patient. The peri-implant soft tissue appearance should emulate and match natural periodontal aesthetics. Ideally, peri-implant soft tissues blend imperceptibly with and mimic the surrounding periodontal soft tissues of the natural dentition. Achieving that goal requires an understanding of periodontal and peri-implant anatomy and an appreciation for factors that influence soft tissue contours around teeth and dental implant restorations. In addition to mastering surgical objectives and techniques, clinicians must be able to evaluate and accurately diagnose the existing periodontal condition.

Esthetic considerations are playing a greater role in the treatment planning of dental care, especially in the restoration of anterior teeth. Much attention has been paid to both operative and prosthodontic techniques that are available in esthetic restorative dentistry. Less attention has been given to soft tissue esthetics, the shape of the face and position of the lips, and the contours, colour, and overall appearance of the gingiva and associated soft tissues. This article reviews a basic approach to soft tissue esthetics, the appearance of the gingiva, the interrelationship of the gingiva, teeth, and restorations, and outlines several common soft tissue problems and their management.
